Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) first developed in Japan and Switzerland in the 1970s. In the 1980s, the idea became popular in the USA and also spread to several countries within Europe. “The Future of Food” introduces you to the first CSA in New Zealand. Note the connection between the farming family and the consumers of the food and the structure of this relationship. What benefits accrue to the parties involved? Are there any real systems changing features you can identify in this simple relationship of reciprocity?
